The idea animating Archaeologies of Touch emerged at the inter-section of two collisions. The first collision took place on December 27, 1990, when my sister –five years old at the time –was involved in a car accident that fractured her spine. The resulting swelling compacted a portion of her spinal column, leaving her paralyzed

Carlin Wing: Archaeologies of Touch opens with an examination of contemporary haptic human-computer interfaces, then quickly jumps backward to situate haptic technology in a linear chronology that begins with electrical machines in the 1740s, and moves forward by examining the way institutional actors in the fields of psychology, engineering, computer science, and advertising address touch. With so much material to cover, it feels like a
